From the History of Activity of National Primary Schools in Transcarpathia of the XX Century

Oktaviia FIZESHI¹

Abstract

The processes of transformation of modern education are aimed at the widest possible implementation of the principles of democratization, demonopolization, cooperation of the school with various social institutions. At the same time, we observe a number of contradictions between the historically proven humanistic direction of primary education and the inadequate level of its implementation in the educational process of modern primary school; between the need to take into account the regional specifics of primary school and insufficient study of the retrospective of local features of its organization and content. Of particular importance is the problem of native language learning in the context of a multicultural region, which is Transcarpathia with its multifaceted and unique history. For many centuries, due to its convenient geographical location, a large number of nationalities and representatives of different religious denominations coexist peacefully in Transcarpathia, mutually enriching each other's culture, traditions and education.

Each state, which included Transcarpathia during the XX century, made its own adjustments in the development of education and schooling, in particular through the implementation of its own language policy. Thus, the publication reveals the peculiarities of the influence of states on the development of primary schools for different nationalities who lived in Transcarpathia during its stay in: Austria-Hungary (until 1919), Czechoslovakia (1919-1938), Carpathian Ukraine (November 1938 - March 1939), Hungary (1939-1944), the Soviet Union (1944-1991), Independent Ukraine (since 1991). During the study of archival materials and legal documents that determined the language and educational policy during the period under study, we also observed trends in the content of teacher training to work in primary schools with national languages of instruction in the pedagogical institutions of Transcarpathia. In particular, the training of teachers for primary school in a multicultural region is important.

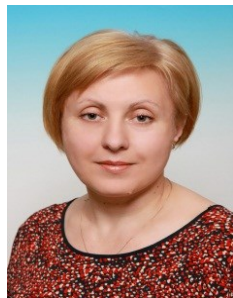

Observing the historical retrospective of the activities of national primary schools in Transcarpathia in the XX century and objective historical and systematic analysis of their experience will allow us to expand the possibilities of determining the prospects for reforming modern primary schools in the context of a single educational space.
